"Native American reservations are the center of political discussion in Montana. A few issues that are prevalent in Montana include the Keystone Pipeline, oil extraction, coal mining, transportation, wolf hunting, and the engagement of local and federal government during land use decisions. The Native American reservations add another level of authority to the decision-making process. These issues are important to the livelihood of the state, the nation, and the citizens that live on the reservations. A debate program at these tribal colleges will allow discussion of these prevalent controversial issues for a greater understanding of the consequences of the decisions that are made for the region"
